Q: How to log the model state before calling something that updates the model I have an application that has a pretty involved viewmodel. I want to be able to log the model state before and after it is updated, but I don't see a nice way to do this without adding a public method onto the viewmodel that logs things. It seems like I should be able to do this with a breakpoint, but I am new to using Xamarin. What is the best way to do this? I have the feeling that I am missing some simple way, but Xamarin isn't letting me think correctly today. A: A simple one liner in the log statement should get you the output you want for every object that gets updated in your VM. Just add a breakpoint to your various methods that perform updates to the model, then check the value of each object before and after the update. The code could look something like this var _logger = DependencyService.Get(); public void TheCrazyUpdateMethod() { var entry = this.Object.Current; var entry2 = this.Object2.Current; _logger.LogMessage("Before update: Entry {0}, Entry2 {1}", entry, entry2); this.Object.Current = new Object() { EntryNumber = 1 }; this.Object2.Current = new Object() { EntryNumber = 2 }; _logger.LogMessage("After update: Entry {0}, Entry2 {1}", entry, entry2); } In the last decade, the construction industry and the home building industry have attempted to integrate the plumbing fixture industry into the home construction industry. A leading example of this integration is the Kohler&Struxks "Integra" system, which couples the plumbing fixture industry with the home building industry. More recently, the plumbing fixture industry has attempted to integrate the plumbing fixture industry into the home building industry by providing a two-piece construction system in which one component is a prefabricated, metal stud frame member and the other component is a prefabricated trim member. Unfortunately, attempts to integrate the plumbing fixture industry into the home building industry in these ways have not been successful, and thus the need exists for a plumbing fixture system

1. Field of the Invention The invention relates to the field of document analysis, and more particularly to data extraction from electronic documents. 2. Description of the Related Art Electronic documents, such as web pages, are sometimes in need of such data extraction. Extracting data from an electronic document may include the process of finding or capturing a specific data region on an electronic document, and in the case of textual data, may include the process of finding or capturing specific text on the electronic document. Commonly, the techniques for extracting data from the electronic document are limited to finding the location of the data on the document, or finding the first instance of a string of characters contained within the document. For example, a user may wish to extract a text string from a web page in order to have the text string printed out, attached to an e-mail, or stored in a database for later use. However, while the user may obtain text from a web page, the text is often formatted to be understood or read by the user. Thus, in order for the user to obtain text that is actually usable in a word processor, a user would have to spend considerable time editing or formatting the text. Furthermore, the user may not even know how to save the text in a word processor or other file format. Alternatively, to save the user this editing/formatting time, a system may allow the user to extract text from the electronic document. However, these systems typically find the first occurrence of a text string in the electronic document and stop. However, a user may not wish the first occurrence of a text string to be the desired occurrence of the text string, but rather may wish to find any instance of a text string, thus not being limited to the first occurrence. Further, these systems do not specify the location at which the text string is found on the electronic document, thus making it more difficult to find a second, third, and fourth occurrence of the text string on the document.Who is the youngest player in the National Hockey League?
