" a rare shift in the [US] courts toward recognizing the practical.(1) Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a ceramic member, and more particularly to a ceramic member having a superior bonding strength between a ceramic substrate and an oxide film of alumina, spinel, mullite or the like and being excellent in mechanical properties such as a fatigue resistance. (2) Description of the Prior Art Ceramic materials are widely used in various fields, because of their excellent heat resistance, high mechanical strength, low thermal expansion coefficient, light weight and the like. Especially, alumina ceramics can be worked or polished by simple processes, and also they are relatively low in cost. Therefore, they are widely applied to industrial products including household electric appliances such as a small air-conditioner and an electric plate heater, an automobile heat exchanger and the like. The ceramic substrate to be used in such products is usually made of alumina ceramics. However, alumina ceramics have a disadvantage that the bonding strength between the substrate and an oxide film formed on the substrate is not sufficient and is further inferior to other materials such as refractory metals. Further, the bonding strength is slightly increased by annealing the substrate, which is a post treatment for preventing peeling of the oxide film from the substrate. In other words, it is difficult to improve the bonding strength by the post treatment alone. It has been known that the bonding strength can be increased by forming a nickel film on the substrate and bonding the oxide film to the substrate via the nickel film
