Malignant hyperthermia (MH) can be a life-threatening condition associated with an increased body temperature, hypermetabolism, hyperthermia, respiratory and metabolic acidosis, and cyanosis. The diagnosis is made when MH-susceptible (MHS) patients experience characteristic clinical and biochemical disturbances after administration of the inhalational or intravenous anesthetics, succinylcholine or dantrolene. In addition to the features of the standard MH crisis, patients with MH are also at risk for developing inappropriate physical, endocrine, and neurological symptoms, such as tachycardia, muscle rigidity, hypermetabolism, hyperthermia, tachypnea, dyspnea, and muscle spasms. These symptoms can be indistinguishable from those of the acute respiratory distress syndrome. We report a case of recurrent episodes of MH and the results of the tests performed to obtain a diagnosis. A 36-year-old African American man with a history of human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) and skin cancer presented to the emergency department with an altered mental status. He was known to be positive for the presence of opioid receptors and to be MHS. The patient had a past history of opioid overdose with an elevated baseline temperature. Metabolic acidosis and hyperglycemia with respiratory distress were present on presentation. Tachycardia, muscle rigidity, hyperthermia, and hypermetabolism were also noted. The patient was diagnosed with MH on hospital day 1 based on a clinical diagnosis of MH and an isolated metabolic acidosis on arterial blood gas analysis. The patient was given an intramuscular injection of dantrolene, and appropriate pharmacotherapy was instituted to manage the
